

Leukemia involves an increase in white blood cells, specifically one type. This increase isn't always abnormal; sometimes it's a normal response to infection. The types of white blood cells affected include neutrophils, eosinophils, monocytes, and lymphocytes. An increase in any of these can contribute to an elevated total white blood cell count. However, determining if this is a normal reaction or leukemia requires further investigation.