

The software development life cycle is divided into five main phases, starting with defining the project idea, then defining the requirements, and then completing the design aspect of the project, to move to the fourth phase of project realization and coding, and the software development life cycle ends with testing it.