

Life in the United Arab Emirates (UAE) a hundred years ago was very different from what it is today. There were no big cities like Dubai or Abu Dhabi. Fresh fruits and vegetables were grown locally or traded from nearby regions. Boats called dhows were used for traveling between coastal towns and for trading with other countries. Pearl diving was another important job, as pearls were valuable and traded with other countries. Instead, life revolved around mosques, markets, and gathering places where people would socialize and trade. The changes over the past century have transformed the UAE into a modern and prosperous country, but it's essential to remember and appreciate the simpler way of life that existed in the past. Back then, the UAE was mostly made up of small villages and towns, and people lived simple lives without the modern conveniences we have now. Most people worked in traditional industries like fishing, pearl diving, and farming. Farming was common too, especially growing date palms, which provided food and materials for many things. People worked hard in traditional jobs, ate locally grown food, traveled by foot or boat, and lived in close-knit communities. Meat was not eaten as frequently as it is now, and when it was, it was usually from animals like goats and camels. There were no cars or planes, so people mostly traveled on foot, by camel, or by boat. Lastly, life was centered around small communities. Fishing was a big part of life for those living near the coast, and people relied on the sea for their livelihoods. In conclusion, life in the UAE a hundred years ago was simpler and more connected to the land and sea. Firstly, jobs were different. Secondly, food was basic compared to now. Dates, fish, and rice were staples of the diet.
