

Angel Reese accuses media of twisting her words: 'I can't trust any of y'all'. Angel Reese said she has no problem with being the WNBA's villain, and she apparently views the media in the same light. So I'm just letting you know -- short and sweet. Greenberg explained that he set out to interview Reese about her new job and all that entails for a 22-year-old instead of focusing on the on-the-court storylines. Reese is a polarizing figure in the basketball community, especially since she's -- fairly or unfairly -- viewed as the top rival to the uber-popular Caitlin Clark. A few questions in, it was clear that one- or two-word answers were the order of the day. And that something was wrong, even though Reese essentially had ignored a couple of questions by saying, dismissively, 'I'm good.' The Sky are known for being an unhelpful organization for media and a staffer attempted to end the interview, with Reese saying "we're good" before the staffer cut it short. Reese, the Sky's star rookie, accused the media of twisting her words in a short and seemingly contentious interview with the Chicago Sun-Times. Reese and the Sky were both fined earlier this year after the former LSU national champion skipped her media obligations following a one-point loss to Clark and the Fever. While Reese did not offer any reasons for why she distrusts the media, it could stem from recent comments she made involving Clark. "I know how y'all like to twist my words, so I'm just keeping it short and sweet," Reese told columnist Steve Greenberg when asked about her short answers that created an awkward interview. 'I can't trust any of y'all.