

A strong belief in the determinative nature of examination results has implications for the type of student who goes on to undertake vocational training. The majority of students attending Egypt's technical colleges are those who have failed to win a university place. While the ability to pay can open doors to a university education, those who cannot afford such privileges are often forced to consider low- skilled labour or vocational education as a necessity, rather than a choice.