

Reaching a suitable site: Although tissue specificity still remains one of the unsolved problems in parasitology, there is a well documented phenomenon e.g., a large number of digenean species preferred to reach and develop in the digestive gland and the gonads of the mollusk host. Some larvae of digenean species are developed in other ectopic sites.