

Not long ago, police in Germany had a hard time returning a little boy to his family after he told them his name was "Mummy's boy". (Mummy) is another word for mother. The boy, aged two, was seen trying to cross a street on his own at a red light in Frankfurt. A driver who had seen the little boy waiting at the light alerted the police. The police decided to try and look for the little boy's family believing since he was so young that he couldn't be too far. But when asked what his name was, he told officers he was: "Mummy's boy" and when asked about his parents the boy could only recall their names as being "Mummy and Papa". Police drove around with him for over an hour, trying to find out whether he could lead them to his home or remember anything that would help them find out who he really was.
