

Caitlin Clark and Angel Reese begin to shake WNBA foundations with their fame.although Caitlin Clark and Angel Reese,were only recently taken in the WNBA Draft, it appears the duo are ready to change the league at its core."The [collective bargaining agreement] stuff is about to happen within the next year, too, so just understanding the gravitation we have, everything is in our hands right now to control."Just five years ago, the New York Liberty were sold for $10–14 million to Joe and Clara Tsai.That's because the Collective Bargaining Agreement (CBA) is set to expire, with Clark recently making note of that at a recent press conference."I think the CBA's up for negotiation after this season. We can opt out of it. And certainly the new media rights deal will have a big update on that too," Clark stated at an Indiana Fever press event, which came after onlookers filmed her at an airport before a commercial flight.In the past, players have been forced to play overseas to supplement their income.That issue was put into the limelight when Brittney Griner was detained in Russia for months after a vape cartridge was found in her luggage while at an airport.