

???By enhancing patient education and addressing psychological distress, medication adherence can be improved, leading to better pain control. One major factor contributing to nonadherence is depression, which not only affects a patient's willingness to follow prescribed treatments but also influences their perception of pain.