

All atoms of a given element are identical, having the same size, mass and chemical properties. In any compound, the ratio of the numbers of atoms of any two of the elements present is either an integer or a simple fraction.