

Corals are small, mini-anemone-like animals called polyps, which can form colonies. Coral reefs are made up of a multitude of coral species which together form an ecosystem, i.e. a very specific natural environment made up of different plants and animals. Corals are classified in the large family of stinging animals, the Cnidaria. Together these polyps form a common skeleton.