

Like plants growing in nature, bread mold needs material on which to feed and grow, but the method of growth is not the same at all, as the fungi that form bread mold grow asexually through the spread of spores on a piece of moist bread.