

The first case I ever encountered was when I was an intern teacher in one of the local private-owned elementary schools. I also noticed that N.B would rally other children not to play with A.L and this would leave A.L to play with her only best friend, J.R. After a few weeks, J.R began to carry more snacks for her recess with which she would share with A.L. At one time, A.L missed school for three days and when she finally reported, she had a broken arm. I was in my third year of college and during the school closure, I went to work as an intern in the elementary school. It was not long before I noticed that one of the twins (A.L) appeared malnourished compared to her sister (N.B). She would also not come to school with snacks for recess. I began to wonder just how careless was A.L at home yet in school she never was clumsy. The deputy head teacher was a sister to the school proprietor who also doubled as the principal. I wondered what would happen if my suspicions were wrong and it went to my record that I was a trouble maker.
