

Pathophysiology of Sickling: The underlying mechanism of sickle cell disease is the presence of hemoglobin S. Under conditions where oxygen levels are low, HbS molecules exhibit a strong tendency to aggregate and polymerize. This polymerization process involves the formation of rigid, insoluble fibers within the red blood cells.