

The development of private stelae during this period can be observed through the changing artistic style. Initially, the stelae followed traditional Egyptian artistic conventions, with figures depicted in a more formal and rigid manner. However, as the Amarna Period progressed, the artistic style shifted towards a more naturalistic and relaxed representation. Figures were depicted with elongated proportions, flowing garments, and a sense of movement.