

Being a good citizen requires more than just obeying laws. At its core, good citizenship involves respect and care for others, honesty, volunteerism, and civic participation. Civic participation encompasses voting in elections, being informed on issues, attending community meetings, and voicing opinions constructively. Respect and care for fellow citizens is demonstrated by simple acts like being considerate of neighbors, helping others in need, and treating all people equally regardless of differences. Above all, good citizens display moral integrity and seek to contribute positively to society.