The process description takes the same form as the mechanism description: a brief introduction, which gives an overview, and the body, which treats each step in detail, usually one step to a section. In each paragraph, first deline the step (often in terms of its goal or end product), and then describe it. Use coordinate structure (see pp. 71–72) for each section. Use conclusions only if you need to point out significance.

Summarized by © lakhasly.com