

Angel Reese brutally told she doesn't deserve same star treatment as Caitlin Clark. Whiting has defended selling Caitlin Clark's merchandise in sporting good stores instead of Angel Reese, claiming she would not "deserve" to be treated the same. Clark, the No. 1 pick in the WNBA Draft, has signed for the Indiana Fever to mark the beginning of her professional career after stepping up from NCAA team Iowa Hawkeyes. The 22-year-old smashed several records during her four-year period with the college program, including taking the all-time points scorer record from Kelsey Plum. She will be joined in the WNBA by Angel Reese after the power forward, 21, was drafted by the Chicago Sky as a No. 7 selection in the first round. Clark's Indiana uniform will be available for purchase in Dick's Sporting Goods stores, an unusual step given she will be a rookie in 2024, but her reputation has apparently increased demand from fans wanting to wear her jersey. However, Reese's jersey is nowhere to be found despite her growing popularity. However, Whiting, who played for the likes of Seattle Reign and Minnesota Lynx in her seven-year career, thinks Reese shouldn't get the same treatment as Clark – as well as dismissing the idea that the decision would be racially motivated. Angel Reese definitely would not deserve to have her gear in Dicks. I'd be upset about that too," she wrote.
