

Unlike quartz resonators, which are cut from a single crystal, a ceramic resonator is molded to a desired shape instead of grown. The material is polycrystalline form of barium titanate, or some similar material. The electrical model is almost identical, with the addition of one resistor, as the material is intrinsically conductive.