

Remembering traumatic or dramatic events in great detail is called “flashbulb memory.” Emotions are processed in the amygdala, which is very close to the hippocampus, which is involved in the long-term coding of information into memories. So it’s no surprise to psychologists that emotionally laden memories might be very strong and remembered vividly.