

Accounting is an information system that measures business activities, processes this data into reports, and communicates the findings to decision-makers (stakeholders). It's considered the "language of business," using accounts—records of financial data—to track transactions, usually expressed monetarily. The American Accounting Association defines accounting as identifying, measuring, and communicating economic information to aid informed judgments and decisions by organizational users.