

Studies of the impact of the mainstream mass media on young people's sexual behavior have been slow to accumulate despite longstanding evidence of substantial sexual content in the mass media. The standards for causal inference articulated by Cook and Campbell (1979) are employed to accomplish this objective.