

Pregnant women store a significant amount of body fat in normal pregnancy in order to meet their own and the fetus's energy needs, and to prepare for the energy demands of lactation