

The question of the amount of food we need is often under investigation. A person who does heavy manual work such as a farmer uses up more calories, and therefore needs more food. It is true that in their teens, children go through a growth stage so they do need extra food. Teenagers are often hungry and this could be the body's way of signalling for food. The amount of work a person does also determines the amount of food he eats.