

These aspects, although known in conventional construction, are rarely used together, and hence the need for their use in FRP composites, can present a major obstacle for acceptance by the civil engineering community. However, these advances require that civil engineers interact with other professionals in the areas of polymer chemistry, composites processing, fiber reinforcements, and material characterization.