

I like to live in the city because the city is characterized by the movement of the dense community and trade and the abundance of industry and communications and universities as well as institutes. In the context of economic crises, unemployment, rural migration, and housing, the State must do all it can to provide all the rural life needs of health services, free education, electricity, and the alleviation of rural-urban migration in order to ease the pressure experienced by the city. The negative aspects of the city are the overcrowding and pollution of the environment and the spread of diseases quickly and the crisis of unemployment, housing, and social pests.
