

Is there a crisis of trust in our digital age? As innovations driving our network societies became more widespread, the trustworthiness of technology underpinning this new age has been taken for granted. Trust is largely based on levels of exposure and familiarity – experience. In network societies, trust is a basic foundation to our use of media, communication tools, and related digital information systems. No more.