

The degree of discomfort is directly proportional to the intensity of the acoustic signal. So even at this rudimentary stage of linguistic evolution, there is a significant transformation from using sound as an iconic or direct reflection of an internal state to using it as a symbolic, indirect manifestation of increasingly complex internal feelings. But in the first month or two of the child's development, crying becomes more differentiated and more symbolic.