

"The story of an hour" by Kate Chopin narrates the events taking place in the last moments of Louise Mallard, a housewife who is happy after being falsely informed about the death of her husband. Feminism is interested in achieving equality so that a woman can be herself and be free without her conduct and place in society being dictated by conservative social norms. It tries to show women that they can do everything that men can do. Resentment towards men is evident in Kate Chopin's through the way Mrs. Mallard rejoices after learning that her husband has died.
