

Aliyah Boston Reveals Truth About 'Added Pressure' From Caitlin Clark. Headlined by Indiana Fever star Caitlin Clark, the 2024 WNBA Draft class has helped exponentially grow the league. This could be especially true for Fever players, as Clark's spotlight is unlike anything the league has seen. When asked about this on X (formerly known as Twitter), Fever center Aliyah Boston downplayed the idea that Clark's attention has created any added pressure: This is a great mindset to have, because while Boston and her teammates certainly have more total eyes on them now than they had previously, the attention itself is not something they are unprepared for. Clark and Boston were the leading All-Star vote getters, as fans wanted to see this exciting duo in Phoenix. This was a deserving honor for both players, as Clark continues to make history on a nightly basis while Boston's consistency has been a catalyst to Indiana's improved play. While so much emphasis gets placed on the outside noise surrounding Clark and her team, Boston spoke highly of the on-court dynamic with one of the league's best facilitators: Named to the All-Star team with Clark, Boston has put together a fantastic sophomore campaign, averaging 13.3 PPG and 8.4 RPG in 21 games.
