

Farmer Gopi went to his field unhappily that day. One day, just as Gopi was about to give up digging on his barren fields, his shovel hit a hard object. Gopi emptied the pot full of hoe, and this time put his shovel in it. But what is that? I can sell these multiplied products in the kingdom market. Every day, Gopi took the pot's multiplied goods to the kingdom, and tried a new product every day. Other sellers were jealous of his success, and complained about Gopi to a soldier of the king. Gopi went before the king, and the king confiscated the pot from him for the kingdom's treasure. Kings were fighting each other for the throne, each claiming to be the real king. When Gopi realized how dangerous the magic pot could be, he sneaked out of the palace during the confusion, and took his pot with him. Because even though it was summer, his field was still not yielding any crops. Oh, my field has not yielded any crops today either. If I can't deliver crops to the kingdom, I'm going to be in trouble. After a while, when he wanted to take his hoe to return home, he realized that there were 100 more hoes in the pot. Another 100 shovels immediately appeared in the pot. Gopi was both amazed and thrilled. The magic pot gave Gopi hundreds of apples and bread. The next day, the soldier secretly followed Gopi. Gopi took the magic pot that morning, and put a chick in the pot to sell at the kingdom market. With hundreds of chicks running around Gopi's house, one accidentally fell into the pot, producing another hundred chicks. Let me take a closer look at this magic pot that will enrich my wealth. From that day on, Gopi's field began to grow crops once again. As he continued digging, he realized that it was a pot. I only have one hoe. Soon, the pot was overflowing with eggs. Huh?
