

Polyelectrolyte precipitation Precipitation methods are usually employed for processing large quantities of feed material proteins, offering modest enrichment and high specificity at a low cost early step in the purification process. Polyelectrolyte precipitation has been identified as a feasible method for an initial, non chromatographic purification step. Precipitation processes can be scaled-up generally for commercial and industrial operations.