

Forster draws in the example of the British magazine, Punch which catered to the everyday and mundane information of the English life. There is no wit, laughter or satire in the magazine but such events which resemble the life a typical Englishman. In such instances he would reject the fellow as an e