

The allocative function of government refers to the process by which the government decides how to distribute resources across various sectors and services in the economy. This involves determining the allocation of public funds to different areas like healthcare, education, defense, infrastructure, and social welfare.