

Radiographic contrast is the density difference between neighboring regions on a plain radiograph. High radiographic contrast is observed in radiographs where density differences are notably distinguished (black to white). Low radiographic contrast is seen on radiographic images where adjacent regions have a low-density difference (black to grey). Contrast A low-contrast image will show little difference in density between structures of interest A high-contrast image will show a larger difference in density between structures.