

A reaction rate measures the number of moles of reactants that disappear per unit time, or the number of moles of products that appear per unit of time. If the volume of the reacting system is constant (or nearly constant), it is convenient to define the rate of reaction as the rate at which the concentration of reactant decreases per unit time or the rate at which the concentration of product increases per unit time