

Recombinant DNA Technology involves inserting specific genes into an organism using genetic vectors such as bacterial plasmids or modified viruses. The target genes are cut using restriction enzymes and then ligated into a vector DNA, which is subsequently introduced into the target cells.