

One of the most critical points raised in the article is the importance of providing English learners with meaningful opportunities to develop their language skills across all content areas. This includes investing in professional development for teachers, providing sufficient funding for English learner programs, and addressing structural inequalities within the education system. It's essential for educators to recognize and value the linguistic and cultural assets that English learners bring to the classroom, rather than viewing their language proficiency as a deficit.