The media coverage of the COVID-19 pandemic often exemplified sensationalism, focusing on alarming statistics and dramatic headlines that emphasized rising case numbers and death tolls.While accurate reporting is crucial, the relentless emphasis on dire predictions contributed to public panic and misinformation, highlighting the media's significant influence on public perception during the crisis and raising concerns about the balance between responsible journalism and engaging narratives.

Summarized by © lakhasly.com