

The participants, 122 first-year university students aged 19–22, were evenly split between Males' Campus and Females' Campus. Using a pretest post– test control group design, the study aimed to assess the effectiveness of integrating technology into EFL reading instruction. The findings suggest that technological tools can be leveraged to establish an environment that enhances reading comprehension, emphasizing the potential benefits of incorporating technology in language learning instruction.