

A mainframe computer is known as an advanced multi-user machine, which is typically used to manage databases such as financial transactions and communications for major organizations such as insurance companies, banks, government offices, hospitals, retail stores and many other sectors as well. Since these applications do not need the computational complexity of supercomputers, mainframes are still very powerful.