

The liver is known to have a very high capacity for regeneration. Mammals (including humans) can survive surgical removal of up to 75% of the total liver mass. Importantly, liver size is also controlled by prevention of organ overgrowth.