

In any encounter, Japanese immediately see themselves as superior or subordinate. Japanese has many verbal and grammatical expressions appropriate to different types of relationship. It is for this reason, that a Japanese may have an awkward task when addressing a group in which persons of several different types of relationship to him are present.