

The initial perception of self-awareness was that it had two dimensions. Knowing yourself entails being able to identify with your emotions, accurately assessing your own strengths and weaknesses, and displaying self-assurance. This two-dimensional approach also suggests that one can become self-aware by concentrating on oneself, which leads to a comparison with one's own standards.