

Emergency situations (natural disasters, accidents, terroristic acts, etc.) create unfavorable conditions which are dangerous to life, health and well-being of significant groups of the population. These effects become catastrophic because they cause wide-scale destructions, death, wounds and sufferings to a great number of people. Moreover, in such conditions people are exposed to psycho-traumatizing factors which cause disturbances of their psychic activity.