

In the beginning Dell Corporation sold computers to customers who ordered them by telephone. Other computer manufacturers, including Hewlett-Packard, compete with Dell by copying its business model, but they are not as successful. Next, the Internet increased Dell's direct sales system and provided its customers with better service and cheaper prices. This is called the direct sales system.