

Caitlin Clark sets awful WNBA record in debut. The women's league season started last night, the opportunity to witness the first minutes of the phenomenon Caitlin Clark in the colors of the Indiana Fever. Given the excitement around Caitlin Clark, her debut was inevitably going to be as scrutinized as those of Victor Wembanyama seven months ago in the NBA. Result: a clear victory (91–72) for the 2023 semi-finalists, and on an individual level, Caitlin Clark was put in difficulty. Faced with the Indiana Fever, the Connecticut Sun had clearly prepared a plan to prevent the new phenomenon of women's basketball from shining. "Obviously it wasn't the best start from me in the first half with some foul problems, to the point of going to the bench. We had to try to get back into the rhythm of the match. Of course, I lost too many balls and that doesn't help get the job done. But there are a lot of things to take away from this match." In fact, Caitlin Clark had to wait until the second quarter to score her first points in the WNBA. "I thought it was physical," she admits.
