

Analysis of combined risk factors showed a clear link between the number of risk factors and relapse severity. Patients with short retention, young age, and extractions had almost four times the relapse severity compared to those with long retention, older age, and no extractions. This indicates that relapse risk is cumulative, suggesting that individualized retention protocols based on risk profiles could be beneficial.