

Multinational firms use social capital to connect its units operating in different locations and different cultures with shared global vision, values, and goals. Social capital link the internal business units across geographic boundaries, and manage relationships within a large external network of firms.