

Conclusion: The experiment successfully measured the speed of sound in air using a resonance tube and tuning forks with known frequencies. Small variations in the measurements could be due to minor experimental errors, such as inaccuracies in reading the water level, environmental factors, or slight differences in temperature. The results were consistent with the expected theoretical value of approximately 343 m/s at room temperature, supporting the hypothesis.